

Sinclair Broadcasting's decision to force their stations to air an anti-Kerry documentary days before the election is a clear example of the dangers of media consolidation.

Sinclair uses the public airwaves free of charge, and is obligated by law to serve the public interest. But when large companies control the airwaves, we get more of what's good for the bottom line and less of what we need for our democracy. Instead of something produced at "News Central" far away, it's more important that we see real people from our own communities and more substantive news about issues that matter. How a discussion of disagreements about the Vietnam war and protests against the Vietnam is really important in this year's election I cannot really see. Clear, issues about health care, the current war in Iraq and against terrorism are much more important.

Sinclair's actions show why we need to strengthen media ownership rules, not weaken them. We did more diversity, not less. Moreover, they show why the license renewal process needs to involve more than a returned postcard. Thank you.
